CHARME

Stakeholder Meeting

March 12

10 am to 3 pm, 2019

How to facilitate tangible Open Science (OS) and Innovation Transfer in life science research?

We take you on a journey behind the scenes and invite you to look at the topic through the eyes of various stakeholders.

BACKGROUND

Everybody is talking about Open Science and innovation transfer. Both, important drivers of the European strategy to optimise the impact and exploitation of knowledge and ideas.

Background of OS is to making research results more accessible to all societal actors, contributes to better and more efficient science, as well as to innovation in public and private sectors. Hence, in order to derive maximum benefit from research skills the dumping of a spreadsheet online is not open data,- and further skills in generating but also properly annotating of data for further integration and analysis are needed.

To achieve this, we need common standards and standard operating procedures as well as workflows that enable the combination of data across standards.

Currently, there is a lack of experts who understand the principles and possess knowledge of the principles and relevant tools in this context. This is a major barrier hindering the implementation of FAIR principles and the reusability of data and thus innovation transfer. Major reason for this is an insufficient and unequal education of scientists producing data in life science that is inherently varied, complex in nature, and large in volume.

Within the Cost Action CHARME we work together to harmonise existing formats and develop new solutions with a focus on the development of uniform cross border training.

Within the stakeholder meeting we invite you to experience the view of the other side(s) and to enter in a discussion with each other.
